I think it was awesome till I finished the first half, I also loved the romantic part at the end of the first half it was awesome, and it actually made my day, I was very cheerful then. I hated the previous peak for sure (when she refused him), but I didn't like what's after that, I might change my mind though.

This is my first book to read for yousef Idris,Am not sure, but I guess it is not one of his best (I think also it wasn't one of his last books to write, because some how I felt it lacked experience - just in some parts).

Didn't like the second half.

I was shocked when I've found that every word in the story applies to 25Jan Revolution. When Hamza describes what he has seen in a demonstration he joined: "All the suit-weares diasppeared when things turned serious. And do you know who remained standing in the square, with bullets coming from all directions? Those boys who appear to have no families, no cloths, no trade. Young kids no older than 15. Dark, dusty and ragged-clothed. Yes, it was the so called riff-raff who stayed on", I could feel like he is talking about today's Egypt.

Again, Yusuf Idris shows my own university professors in the character of Hamza's professor who was speaking in a quit voice about how if we improved our morals and spirituality the British would not be able to remain in our country, the old regime in my case. Hamza replied: " The occupier will not leave except by force, and by force alone will the people be liberated". The professor wrote " Knowledge = Strength". Hamza, my hero, changed the words to be "Knowledge (in an independent country) = Strength". Idris comments on this by " And that was the beginning of the road".

It's sad that I can't find the original Arabic version. Yet, I enjoyed reading this one.
