This is actually the first Arabic book I ever read. My mom recommended it, and it was the whole "Every girl should read for Ehsan Abd Al Kodous at some point in her life."

I don't know if it's because it was my first book, or because I was younger when I read it (I'm reviewing it 3 years later), but I do think it was such a great read.

I loved every part of it, and I was so into it, and into the character 'Alyah', and the story behind the book... I connected with it as I do agree with the concept of having feelings define our age and the course of our lives.

I just absolutely fell in love with this book... THANKS MOM!

The first thing that stroke me while reading this book is that it is completely different from the movie based on it which I once watched and actually adored, probably much more than I liked the novel. However, this is a genius work that sheds light on the status of young ladies, widows and any other woman who dares to be "manless" in the Egyptian society, any woman who dares to seek happiness without a man. The book shows how such women are persecuted, their reputations torn apart by people's tongues. On the other hand, the same society does not mind handing over a teenager to a man her father's age just in order to stop ruining her reputation. Moreover, in the eyes of the society, a manless woman would always be thought of as an easy prey and a whore by definition.
