The Gifted Jennifer Whitfield

Told from a dual pov; twin sisters, Cassie and Jessica have a normal life. Of friends, a great family and school... until that one moment their whole lives are turned upside down.

That moment when their parents let them in on a secret that will shock them to the core.

The reveal of their true parentage: They are not completely human.

With this new discovery, the twins are forced to leave everything they knew of their lives and attend a new, specialized boarding school for people like them.

But what they don't know is that danger and evil lies beneath the surface of their new home. A murder mystery begins and the clock ticks down until one of them is the last one left.

Who or what is this true evil taking over their new paradise? Will Cassie be able to stop it before it takes her too?

Jen says

I wrote this, but under my other account.

This is a story that has been in my head for years and finally able to share it with everyone, even though last year I had originally published another version of it that I know now I was never that satisfied with.

great ideas.... poorly written

Marlana says

I was gifted this book as part of the the First Reads program.

This story could be good but still needs A LOT of work. The actual writing was brutal to get through because of the plethora of spelling and grammar errors. I decided to power through so that I could review the actual story. There were still several issues there. The author has obviously never been to NYC based on the descriptions of Grand Central and some blatant geography issues. It is probably best to stick to what you know. It also seems that several important things were skipped over, and the train of thought was sometimes pretty scattered.
